... With Amalfitano being the first person to come up with the idea of “Keep it simple, stupid.” I went on to offer some other characters who one could check out who followed the same idea, and have come to be known as the “Keep it simple” list. The list has grown to include some of the greatest characters in the OED (The people who make the OED):

1. On Friday, we added 75 new words that were misspelled.
2. We added 28 new words that were misspelled on Friday.
3. We have corrected 1,089,915 words that were spelled incorrectly in the past.

Our total of 1,082,336 words that we have fixed over the past year is our highest ever. As we look toward the end of the year we are proud of our 723,369 changes that were made by over 126,000 contributors. We set out to fix the 3,216 words in each day for the month of November; by checking all 115,420,339 words that we have available in the library, we have now checked all 3,207,951 words. On Friday, we had 1,859,547 words to go. There were 1,724,431 words available in the library (or over 90%) that had been checked and corrected for the month of November. We made some headway on Christmas Eve. We have now checked 2,479,419 (or 89%) of the 3,217,140 words that we had available on Christmas Eve. We made tremendous headway on Christmas day with 55,323 words checked and corrected for the holiday. There are still 3,024,567 (over 90%) that have yet to be checked. We are having a great year and more are coming in each day. For the first time ever, we are breaking through the two million word mark this year. We had a very special occasion on Friday, November 17, 2014 when Ed Bott passed away. He was a tremendously dedicated volunteer with the OED staff, and not only did he help us by fixing phrases, he often worked on his own until he made an important discovery about a missing word. He was one of the brightest people I have ever met. Ed was a gentle man who was kind to everyone. He was like a little brother to me and that'

What's New in the Adobe Photoshop 2021 (Version 22.4.3)?

Assessment of Fenton oxidation and electrocoagulation for synergistic treatment of petroleum wastewater in a pilot-scale electrochemical reactor. The treatment performance of a pilot-scale electrochemical reactor (ER) for petroleum wastewater was evaluated during the pH-change process at two different stages of ER operation (first stage: 2000 pore volumes, 3.5 h; second stage: 4000 pore volumes, 4.5 h). The reactor exhibited excellent treatment performance for petroleum wastewater by using the combination of non-thermal oxidative treatment (Fenton's reagent) and electrocoagulation (EC) at pH 6 in the first stage. In addition, the synergistic treatment using these two treatments successfully decomposed, mineralized and removed the petroleum product from the treated wastewater effectively. However, there was some residual oil in the treated water using a separate treatment of Fenton oxidation (FO) and EC at pH 8 in the second stage. The removal of oil, methane and other biodegradable compounds was increased by using the sequential treatment of FO and EC, followed by the combined treatment of physical treatment (pump aeration) and the EC process, using the pilot-scale ER. The combined treatment of FO and EC is cost-effective because it provides a highly efficient technology to treat non-ferrous metal-contaminated wastewater in an industrial scale. It is common to have multiple lights available on sports equipment. Routinely, the lights have a cover so that they can be stored in a “dumped” position. The cover is typically secured using a buckle or the like and when it needs to be removed or replaced, it is simply removed and replaced. One problem with this arrangement is that securing the cover on the light can be difficult and time consuming. In addition, the user is required to carry a buckle or the like to handle the covers, which adds additional weight to the equipment. These types of covers are often lost or simply left in a convenient place. There remains a need in the art for an improved mounting system for a cover., not both. You might be tempted to try something else, such as installing a timer, and you are better off leaving your AC on. Trying to do it the other way will make your home overheated, which will cause damage. You should know that setting up a timer will not make your AC run all the time. It will depend on how you want it to run. Some experts say that you should only turn the
