Aug 30, 2017 Can Vuze VR be used for HiFi or Hi-Res audio? Don't let go, stand right there where the shadow begins, as the sun rises over the mountains. There are questions. How Is The Best Quality? Hello everyone, This is a thread to start a discussion on the quality of 360 media that is shot using the Vuze and Vuze Plus. I've been considering joining a team and using a Vuze+ for my production. I was wondering if the quality of the recorded video was significantly different from the recorded video using the old vuze. I am not a cameraman (nor a professional anyway), I know you can use different "lenses" for the entire process, but what kind of quality can I expect to get with the Vuze+ considering it has better optics and the fact you are simply receiving a frame from the camera instead of a pic where you could in theory paint over the sensor in photoshop? If you have had any experience with Vuze and the original Vuze, would it be safe to assume that the quality will be the same as vuze plus? * How is quality when we stop and move around? * How much of a difference is there between 50 fps and 60 fps when we are stationary? * Why do some images from my old vuze have a lot of noise or have rainbow issues when I record with the vuze+? * Will using a team for production higher quality shots? A: How Is The Best Quality? The quality of the images that Vuze captures does not depend on the quality of the optics. In reality, it is often superior to the quality of the optical quality that we achieve. Quality can only be measured relative to other methods or media: A Vuze could be compared to a single-use disposable camera, which is not that bad, but less than satisfactory. You could have similar shots with a good camera and lens, but who would want to do that. You might as well buy some good fixed lenses and use the single-use camera for that. A Vuze could be compared to SDI, which has been superseded by HD, which is superseded by HDMI, which has been superseded by Ethernet. It's the same, but the improvement is spectacular. Please make sure to resize the images to 320 px as people (including me) have an
